This study was performed to evaluate the effect of post-hysterectomy estrogen replacement therapy on endometrial regeneration. We randomly assigned 100 patients to 2 groups. Group 1 (n = 50) was given post-hysterectomy estrogen replacement therapy and group 2 (n = 50) was not given this therapy. The ages of the patients were between 45 and 65 years. All the patients underwent vaginal and/or abdominal myomectomy and subsequent laser therapy. Endometrial regeneration was evaluated with hysterosalpingography, sonohysterography, and histopathologic evaluation of the biopsy specimen. The data were analyzed with SPSS/PC statistical software. We found that post-hysterectomy estrogen replacement therapy was effective in the endometrial regeneration after laser therapy. Convolutional neural network to segment brain MRI into subcomponents: Improved performance for the hippocampus. In this work, we developed a computer aided detection (CAD) system, trained to automatically segment MRI brain scans into anatomically distinct subcomponents, for use in clinical settings. Our CAD approach utilized a convolutional neural network (CNN) to train a sequence of classifiers, each of which classified image patches into their respective subcomponents. Training patches were extracted from the image at regular intervals, without the need to process the original scans into cubic voxel images. In addition, a novel multi-scale interleaved patch-wise approach was developed to train the CNN, which allowed it to improve its classification accuracy in regions that are small compared with the training patches, without the need for resampling or downsampling to produce training patches. We compared the performance of the proposed CAD system with five other commonly used CAD systems, using a freely available dataset of 22 hippocampal brain MRI scans. Our CAD approach provided consistently better segmentation accuracy than those of the other systems. Moreover, we compared the performance of our CAD system using the interleaved patch-wise approach with the performance of the interleaved patch-based approach, which allows us to understand the impact of patch size on CNN performance. While using the larger sized training patches led to improved performance

In 1962, a young mathematician named Matthew Ridgway received a patent that was to prove an invaluable tool in the global fight against poverty. The patent, which was awarded to him jointly with George Antunes, describes a system for "electronic data processing in a banking transaction system." It's the first of many patents that Ridgway will receive, and it's safe to say that he will go down in history as the most prolific inventor ever. Even now, when the U.S. is still in possession of the most patents of any country in the world (14,021), Ridgway has received more than 11,000 — more than all but 14 other people. Thanks to the Freedom of Information Act, we have a list of every single one of Ridgway's patents. Here are the top 10: 1.
