This document provides additional clarifying statements that apply to the use of IPv6 addresses for the purpose of host identity and host discovery in the core Internet addressing system. Cognitive and affective components in depression and anxiety: An investigation of the relationship between rumination and distress in non-clinical samples. Rumination is commonly associated with depression and anxiety, yet the impact of rumination on emotional processing is not well understood. This may be due to a lack of distinction between cognitive and affective components of rumination, which may lead to the investigation of rumination as a form of rumination. Rumination is thought to involve a combination of cognitive and affective components. Therefore, this study aimed to investigate the relationship between rumination as a whole and affective and cognitive components. This study aimed to investigate the relationship between rumination as a whole and both the cognitive (rumination-associated memory and attention) and affective (negative and positive affect) components of rumination. Participants were recruited from the psychology and arts departments at Sheffield Hallam University. Both a student (n=37) and a non-student (n=33) sample completed the Rumination-Related Rumination Scale and a measure of positive and negative affect. Negative and positive affect were associated with the cognitive component of rumination. However, positive and negative affect were not associated with the affective component of rumination. The findings highlight the importance of disentangling rumination into its cognitive and affective components. Further research is needed to investigate rumination as a form of rumination and consider the relationship between rumination and cognitive components of emotional processing.
